

CUSTOMER EXPERIENCE PRODUCT LAUNCH

Instructional Design Case Study

Source-material packet — FlexLine Business Credit launch readiness

1. Background

Northstar Business Finance is preparing to launch FlexLine Business Credit, a new revolving credit product for small-business customers.

Customer Experience representatives will begin fielding customer questions about the product in three weeks. No formal learning solution currently exists.

The available source material consists of a preliminary product brief from Product Marketing, customer questions captured during a limited pilot, and a stakeholder email outlining the desired learning experience, audience considerations, and project constraints.

2. Business Need

Customer Experience representatives must be prepared to accurately explain the new product, distinguish it from more familiar financing options, address common customer misconceptions, and know when additional reference material or escalation is appropriate.

The learning solution must support both newly hired representatives with limited lending-product knowledge and experienced representatives who are primarily learning what is different about FlexLine Business Credit.

3. Project Goal

Analyze the available information, identify the performance and knowledge gaps most likely to affect customer conversations, and design a practical learning solution that prepares representatives to confidently support the product launch.
